The Garden City promises green pastures for students

I chose Singapore for many reasons, the most important being a world-class education, excellent career opportunities and proximity to home (India). The system of tuition grant available to all students helps reduce the cost of education substantially and the three-year bond after completing college provides some kind of job security. Besides this, Singapore Management University (SMU) courses are well-structured. The university offers a compulsory core study body, following which students are able to choose their electives. There are more than 110 extracurricular activities to choose from, ranging from sport to community service. The class is a composite of students from all over Asia, which makes it vibrant. In short, at the university, students can tailor their education to suit their career interests and passions.

The best part about studying and living in Singapore is opportunity. In just over a year in Singapore, I have managed to source part-time jobs and have already completed a summer internship with Coca-Cola. For students who wish to advance their careers, this is the land of opportunity in Asia. Apart from a career perspective, the garden city is a nice place to live in. Efficient public transportation, clean roads, safety, affordable accommodation and local delicacies are some of the other reasons I love it here.
